The daily chart of Hindustan Unilever Limited (HUL) reflects a clear bearish trend, with the share price declining from around ₹2,650–2,700 in late August/September 2025 to approximately ₹1,932 at present. The chart forms a sequence of lower highs and lower lows, showing that selling pressure has dominated across the period. Several recovery attempts during October, February, April, and July were unable to hold higher levels and were followed by renewed declines. The sharp rebound in April toward ₹2,375 was rejected quickly, indicating strong supply in the ₹2,300t o 2,400 region. More recently, HUL has slipped below the important ₹2,000 psychological level and is hovering near a visible one-year low. Immediate support appears around ₹1,900–1,920, and a sustained breakdown below this zone may signal further downside. On the other hand, ₹2,000 is likely to act as initial resistance, followed by the ₹2,050 to 2,100 zone.

For a potential trend reversal, HUL would first need to defend the ₹1,900–1,920 support zone and show sustained buying interest. A close back above ₹2,000, followed by strength above ₹2,050–2,100, could indicate that selling momentum is easing. Until then, the price action suggests investors should remain cautious and watch for confirmation rather than assuming the stock has bottomed out.
